Abstract

The production of knowledge about the social world is observed to be context-dependent. This paper discusses the two contexts: mind-set context and social context, and develops a theoretical framework to produce knowledge by integrating these two premises of knowledge in identifying transcendental reality that helps humans to construct day to day or other trivial realities. It explains that the production of knowledge depends upon the construction of reality; if it is done through transcendental reality, the knowledge of the social world will be comprehensive, closer to reality and altruistic. In case it is done in the absence of transcendental reality relying on egoistic attributes and based on facticity alone neglecting the purpose for which social word comes into existence and the force that it operates, the knowledge will be misleading. © Serials Publications.
